The human body comes equipped with a biological clock that synchronizes it with the rhythm of nature. This body clock binds us to the circadian cycles of light and dark, due to the rotation of the Earth on its journey around the sun. Our internal clock puts us to sleep at dusk and awakens us with the dawn.

The time measured on a sundial can be anything up to a quarter of an hour ahead or behind the time measured by a clock, the amount varying with the seasons. Our day is an average day, accurate by the clock only four times a year. The day, at least, is universally recognised on earth. Longer measures of time present other problems.
